Adedotun Oseni-Adegbite has always been interested in technology, especially console and computer video games, since he was young. Frequent defeats led him to study the games and computer science, in general. Realizing that being computer savvy would improve his gameplay, he took C++ and Java programming classes for their application to video game design and production. A graduate of Sherwood High School in Sandy Spring, Maryland, he will attend the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where he looks forward to diving in to his deepest passions: video games and programming.

Julia Rodriguez graduated from Falls Church High School in Virginia. A leader in her school and community, she was appointed to Fairfax County Public Schools' Student Advisory Council and the Superintendent's Minority Student Achievement Oversight Committee. Out of her experience as a domestic violence survivor, she created a new awareness initiative within her school and the county for students seeking relief from such circumstances. She will attend Champlain College in Burlington, Vermont to study Public Relations, a first step in reaching her goals of attending law school and securing a career in crisis management.

Miriam Tekle was born and raised in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia. Moving to the United States four years ago, she had one goal: to take full advantage of the opportunities that came her way. Her transition to American life was not easy, but it helped her become an independent young woman. Her origin both motivates and encourages her to reach her full potential. A graduate of James W. Robinson Secondary School in Fairfax, VA, she will attend the University of Mary Washington to major in Chemistry and follow the Pre-Medicine track. Upon graduation, she plans to further her education by attending medical school.
